6) Beyond the fact that the selected date happens to fall on an Ekadasi day, there appear to be no other objection. A date in February seems preferable to a corresponding date in March the probability of a cloudless and rainless night being greater in the former month. As regards fairs and festivals which it is usual to avoid as far as possible in fixing a date, it is very difficult to fix a date without fairs and festivals taking place on or near the selected date and moreover it is not possible to dogmatize on this without the calendar for February and March 1921. I therefore agree with the substance of the reply proposed.

7) 2. I would however invite attention to the fact that if the 18th February 1921 is finally selected as the date of final Census, the final Census would have been accelerated by nearly a month as compared with the corresponding date for the Census of 1911 and that this would necessit corresponding acceleration in the several stages of the preliminary Census operations from now to February 1921. This aspect of the matter requires careful consideration after the date is finally settled.
